It has been scarcely 200 years the dawn of the Industrial Revolution—since humans abandoned sole reliance on firewood, other biomass fuels, and direct sunlight to meet daily energy needs. In the past half-century, global demand for energy grew twice as fast as population, as industrial nations burned, coal, oil and natural gas to fuel their economies. Over the next half-century, world energy demands are projected to continue, expanding beyond population growth as developing countries try to catch up with industrial nations.
