The present dissertation is a historical and critical research into the doctrine of theologians and canon lawyers on the much-debated question of the legal origin of nullity in a coerced marriage. Authors included in the research start with Thomas Sanchez (1550-1610) and continue onto present day authors. Attention is given also to pertinent highlights of the Church's jurisprudential practice, both recent and past, regarding the nullity of a coerced marriage. In the study particular focus is devoted to the question of indirect fear, which fear gained full juridical relevance in the 1983 Code of Canon Law. The present work not only contributes to a historical and doctrinal understanding of canon 1103, but also it will assist individual judges in deciding cases of nullity due to coercion in those marriages that are not subject to the Church's laws.
